With coal and nuclear use encouraged and discouraged, goal of adequate energy is remaining hard to achieve

An example of the multiplicity of regulatory agencies and their overlapping roles is afforded by two mid-May developments related to the burning of coal to produce electrical power the burning or coal to produce elec-trical power.

The topic is of particular interest here because of the vast Illinois reserves of high-sulfur coal and because of the proposal for a coal conversion facility at WoodRiver.

The two occurrences referred to are a $17,000 fine levied against Commonwealth Edison Co., Chicago, for operating 19 coal-burning power generating units in Illinois, and a Federal Energy Ad-ministration plan to force power plants to burn coal rather than oil or natural gas.

ministration plan to force power plants to burn coal rather than oil or natural gas.

The fine by the Illinois Pollution Control Board cited power plants in Chicago. Springfield. Rockford. Peoria, Waukegan, Dixon and Joilet. The board ruled that although four operating licenses, the utility did not act to obtain the permits until after the Illinois Environmental Protection Agency had filed suit in August 1973. The act requiring such permits took effect in March 1973.

The FEA meanwhile said a million barrels of oil a day could be saved, plus a large amount of natural gas, if electricity was generated only through use of coal. For compliance, there would have to be extensive upgrading of air pollution controls perhaps involving unproven as well as proven techniques. Some utilities are expected to contest the FEA orders in court.

House has not acted. In addition to this legislative hurdle, under existing law the Environmental Protection Agency can grant only certain limited variances from pollution rules for power plants ordered by the FEA to convert to coal. The future coal market, particularly for the less-polluting low-sulfur coal, is expected to be tight because of increased coal demand resulting from high oil prices and the shortage of natural gas. High-sulfur coal leads to added air quality problems at power plants.

The principal alternative, nuclear power plants, remains far behind schedule acroes the nation, including Illinois Power Company's Clinton facility, due to citizen opposition and an unbelievably long list of regulatory procedures and requirements.

list of regulatory procedures and requirements.

All of which makes one wonder whether the road to energy self-sufficiency will soon be "regulated" by signs warning, "You just can't get there from here." It also brings to mind the "solution" an environmentalist friend of ours has for the tug-of-war between pure air and potential electric brownouts affecting, among other things, air-conditioning. His recommendation: "Sweat."
